U.S. and EU Fund Voter Education for Kenya's Referendum

April 23, 2010

American and European diplomats announced Friday that they will be providing tangible support to the Kenyan government as it educates the public on the contents of the Draft Constitution. The governments plan to work with the Interim Independent Electoral Commission (IIEC), the Committee of Experts, and civil society to clarify any misperceptions about the document.

"The civic education must help bust the myths and inaccuracies around the contents of the draft," said Eric van der Linden of the European Union.

In addition to voter education, the diplomats also intend to support programs working to register millions of Kenyans who are currently ineligible to vote. 5.7 million Kenyans have been registered since the voter registration drive began.

While the United States and European Union have been vocal in their support of the reforms proposed in the draft, this exercise is not intended to sway Kenyans to one side or the other on the debate. It is meant to ensure that all citizens are well-informed about what it is they're voting on before the referendum takes place.

"What appears equally critical at this stage is to increase efforts to ensure that Kenyans make informed decisions in the referendum, civic education must have the widest possible outreach," said US Ambassador Michael Ranneberger.

The United States has announced it will grant nearly $2 million to help fund the referendum. The vote will utilize more advanced security procedures to protect against fraud, including the release of real-time results of the voting.
